FAMILY: Notodontidae SUBFAMILY: Heterocampinae TRIBE:

TAXONOMIC_COMMENTS: Heterocampa umbrata was recently split into two species by Miller et al. (2021) based on differences in genitalia and larval characters, with populations in Florida and southern Georgia being recognized as a separate species (H. umbrata, sensu stricto) from the remaining populations in eastern North America (H. pulverea). However, our barcoding analyses for specimens from throughout the range do not support the view that the Florida and southern Georgia populations constitute a separate evolutionary lineage that merits recognition as a separate species. Specimens from this region are very similar genetically to those from areas outside of Florida and southern Georgia and are nested among other populations of H. pulverea (sensu Miller et al., 2021). Here, we continue to treat these two forms as a single species (H. umbrata) until additional studies are conducted on genetic and morphological variation in the species, particularly in the contact zone of these forms in southern Georgia and vicinity.
